We have taken some little pains to examine into the political history of Daniel W. Veorhees, the nominee of the Douglas Democracy for Congressional honors in the 7th district of Indiana, and we must say that as a political trickster, in the frequency of his political sommersets, and in fact, in all the elements of a successful demagogue he has but few, if any equals, without it is his illustrious captain Stephen A. Douglas, in whose footsteps he is at this time following.

He first started out in political life iden tified with the Whig party, and when be found that success would be more likely to -trew his pathway be renounced THAT party and became a Democrat and was soon the nominee of that party for Congress .-Again when the split in the Democratic party occurred, when Stephen A. Douglas arrayed himself in opposition to the Administration, he espoused his cause, and like his master bitterly assailed the Administration, he imagined that the pathway to political renown pointed in that direction.
